modore Bainbridge was struck in the hip by a musket ball. He refused to leave the deck, and even after a second wound still staid above directing movements. After fighting some time at long range Bainbridge decided to close in and stand the Java's raking so that he could put in some of the destructive hull shots for which American captains were famous. The Java was soon un-manageable, with her head sails gone and her bowsprit shot away. The Constitution dropped astern of her and raked her deck lengthwise.

Then the British captain determined to board the American. In closing the Java ran her jib boom into the mizzen rigging of her opponent, but she soon lost her jib and received a severe raking from the stern. Under this fire her foremost went down, smashing in the foreeastle and main deck.

After some maneuvering in which, as usual, the Constitution avoided the raking fire of the Java, the vessels stood broadside to broadside. The first fire of the Constitution carried away the Java's mizzen mast. All that remained was her mainmast with its yards gone. The English ceased firing, but their flag did not come down. Bainbridge lay to, and after an interval, seeing the Java's ensign still flying, prepared to open his guns again. Then the British colors were struck. Meanwhile the Java's mainmast had fallen, perforated with shot. All her masts had been cut through with American missiles. Besides, the hull of the vessel was torn open and she was leaking badly. Bainbridge lost 84 killed and wounded, while the loss of the British was more than 200.

The victory over the Java closed the brilliant achievements of the year 1812 for the navy. The Constitution, with Commodore Bainbridge on deck, reached Boston early in 1813. Signal guns aunounced the arrival, and when the wounded commodore appeared on the crowded street, supported on either side by the naval heroes John Rodgers and Isaac Hull, the people went wild with enthusiasm. At the beginning of the war it had been proposed in Washing-ton that the nation's navy be laid up to

Feb. 20, 1815, after peace had been declared at home and in England.

Late in December, 1814, the Consti-tution escaped from the port of Boston, where a British squadron had kept her under blockade over eight months. She was "spoiling" for action and set out for the mid-Atlantic. While sailing from the Azores to Madeira about noon on the 20th of February she sighted two vessels—the corvet Cyane of 22 guns and the sloop Levant of 20. They were ten miles apart at first, the Levant in the wake, but seeing the Constituup to the Britons until evening, and The Briton of course replied, but the Constitution forged ahead after the Le-

It was give and take with these two until they were completely buried in smoke. Then the Cyane crawled up under the Constitution's quarter. Stewart instantly tackled the new enemy, giv-ing Levant a parting broadside. Skillfully avoiding a rake from the Cyane, he backed until he brought her abeam, Two Houses on Panahou street, then silenced her with a tremendous cannonade. The Levant meanwhile bore down to help her consort. Seeing this, Stewart filled out, and, running for her, gave her two stern rakes before she could wear to get into position. Wearing himself, he maneuvered under cover of the smoke until he brought his ship astern of the Cyane. Raking her as he had her consort, he compelled her to strike and hastened after the Levant, which had hauled off to repair, but was returning to the combat. The two met on opposite tacks and exchanged broadsides. A few volleys were enough for the Briton, and she tried to escape, but the Constitution kept at her heels and brought her to with her bow guns.

After the fight the British captains, discussing the battle in the cabin of the Constitution, told Stewart he owed his victory to their faulty maneuvering. "Gentlemen," said he, "it is no use getting warm about it. It would have been all the same whatever you might have done. If you doubt that, I'll put you all on board your ships again, and
